1. Use Google Keep or another note-taking app to compile a list of potential YouTube influencers. This might include people who have a large following on the platform, those who regularly create high-quality videos, or those with a specific topic or niche that you want to cover.
2. Once you've compiled your list, start by searching for their names in the "Who is on YouTube" section of the main website. You can also use this tool to see which channels they own or are affiliated with.
3. Next, reach out to these individuals directly via email or social media (if they've given permission). Introduce yourself and tell them why you think their content could be helpful for your channel. Be sure to include links to any relevant content you've created so far.
4. Take things slow at first – only contact those influencers who seem interested in helping you out. If someone isn't responsive, don't keep trying – there are plenty of other people out there who would love to collaborate with you!

3. Follow the influencer's social media accounts, including Facebook, Twitter, and Instagram, to stay up-to-date on their latest content and see if they're featuring products or services similar to yours.
4. Contact the influencer directly through email or social media direct messages if you have something specific you want them to promote in a video or article.

Conclusion

If you're looking to start a YouTube channel and build an audience of loyal fans, then you'll need to find YouTube influencers. Here are five tips for finding and connecting with them: 1. Look for channels that align with your interests. If you're interested in fashion, look for fashion-related YouTubers to follow. If you're interested in lifestyle topics, look for bloggers who cover those topics. 2. Search for related keywords on Google and elsewhere online. When you type specific terms into Google, such as "How to be a successful YouTuber," the first page of results will likely be dominated by popular accounts that are using those same keywords to attract viewers. Use this information to help target your Influencer search further by looking for similar-minded channels and individuals who may have more experience or knowledge than you do when it comes to starting or growing a YouTube channel. 3. Reach out directly via social media or email outreach campaigns. Some high-profile YouTubers maintain contact lists of people they've interacted with on the platform (either through commenting or uploading content) and may be happy to hear from others who are also interested in making their content available online. Additionally, some top influencers offer free resources or services (such as web hosting) to anyone who signs up for their mailing list or follows them on social media – so keep an eye out for these types of offers! In addition, consider attending events (such as webinars) offered by influential YouTubers in order to gain access to their audience and learn more about how best to market your channel towards them. As always, use common sense when approaching any potential connection; if the individual seems shady or uninterested in what you have to say, it's probably not worth pursuing that relationship further."
